GENERAL STUDY OVERVIEW

STUDY IDENTIFICATION

CRIMINAL CAREERS OF JUVENILES IN NEW YORK CITY, 1977-1983

PURPOSE OF THE STUDY

This longitudinal study of juvenile offenders traces the criminal histories of a sample of juveniles, including those who were "dropouts" (juvenile offenders who did not go on to become adult criminal offenders) and those who continued to be arrested, ranging from those with only one subsequent arrest to "persisters" (juveniles who did become career criminal offenders). Much of the research attempting to examine the links between chronic adult offenders and the frequency and severity of juvenile criminality has been retrospective in nature. In such studies, criminal history and other background factors about subjects who have already committed crimes are examined. Predictive factors are assessed by looking backwards. However, this type of research provides no information on those juvenile offenders who did not go on to be severe, repeat adult offenders. To predict future criminality correctly, both types of offenders ("dropouts" as well as "persisters") must be part of the analysis. To address this concern, the investigators conducted a prospective study, providing longitudinal arrest data on a sample of juvenile offenders. The data address the following questions: (1) Are serious juvenile offenders more likely than non-serious juvenile offenders to become adult offenders? (2) Are offenders who begin at a younger age more likely to have more serious criminal careers than those who begin when they are older? (3) As a criminal career progresses, will the offender become more skilled at one type of offense and commit that type of crime more frequently, while decreasing the frequency of other types of crimes? (4) As a criminal career progresses, will the offender commit progressively more serious offenses? (5) How well can high-rate offenders be predicted?

METHODS

STUDY DESIGN

This study employed a longitudinal prospective design. The investigators randomly selected 14- and 15-year-olds who were referred by police to Probation Intake in the New York City Family Court as a result of an arrest on delinquency charges. This group was followed until September 1983 (up to six years of follow-up). All subsequent arrests, dispositions, and incarcerations, both juvenile and adult, were recorded during this portion of data collection. A great deal of attention was focused on gathering data from various sources and organizing these data into a useful database. The investigators collected a large portion of data from the Family Court Disposition Study (FCDS). The investigators used the FCDS as the pool from which the sample was selected and as a source of data about juveniles' prior criminal history and current court case. In addition, the researchers extracted data about subsequent juvenile contacts with the criminal justice system from the Probation Department files and the Police Department arrest files. The investigators also obtained data regarding the sample's later contacts with the criminal justice system from three existing official record systems, the New York City Criminal Justice Agency (CJA), the New York State Division of Criminal Justice Services (DCJS), and the Office of Court Administration (OCA).

SOURCES OF INFORMATION

The majority of the preliminary data were obtained by the Family Court Disposition Study (FCDS). The FCDS was conducted by the Vera Institute of Justice in 1977. The FCDS data were collected from a variety of sources. Data regarding prior juvenile arrests were obtained from the Probation Intake logbooks in the Family Court. Data about the families of the sampled juveniles were obtained from the Probation Department files, and court and arrest information was obtained from the Family Court case records and the arrest reports of the Police Department's Youth Records Unit. In addition to the initial FCDS data, other sources were used to collect the follow-up information. The probation file and the Police Department arrest file for each of the 14- and 15-year-olds were checked to identify the individuals in the sample who were subsequently arrested and brought back to the Family Court after the FCDS data were collected. Subsequent adult criminal justice data were collected from three agencies: the New York City Criminal Justice Agency (CJA), the New York State Division of Criminal Justice Services (DCJS), and the Office of Court Administration (OCA).

SAMPLE

The sample was originally drawn by the Family Court Disposition Study (FCDS). The FCDS randomly sampled one of ten juvenile delinquency cases appearing at Probation Intake in the New York City Family Court during a one-year period, and one in six of all status offense cases. The present study selected a subsample from the FCDS study based on two selection criteria. First, only those offenders brought to Probation Intake for delinquency offenses were included, and not those referred to court for status offenses. Second, in order to maximize the length of time that the offenders could be followed as adults, only the oldest juveniles were selected from the FCDS. The final sample for the present study includes juveniles at ages 14 and 15 who had been brought to Probation Intake in the New York City Family Court from April 1, 1977, to March 31, 1978. The FCDS subsample also constituted the sample for which up to ten prior delinquency arrests and all subsequent juvenile and adult arrests and incarcerations up to 1983 were collected. Arrest and incarceration records for 1,261 of the 1,890 juvenile offenders in the FCDS subsample were obtained.

RESPONSE RATES

A response rate for the subsample selected from the FCDS study is not applicable, since the investigators used secondary data sources. The rate at which the investigators obtained subsequent arrest and incarceration records was 66.7 percent. Arrest and incarceration records for 1,261 of the 1,890 juvenile offenders in the FCDS subsample were obtained.

DATES OF DATA COLLECTION

SUMMARY OF CONTENTS

DESCRIPTION OF VARIABLES

Part 1 of this study contains data on a subsample of 14- and 15-year-olds who were brought to Probation Intake for delinquency offenses. Included on this file are variables such as arrest charge, categorized into type and severity, date of arrest for the sample case, disposition and sentence of the sample case, sex and race of the offender, highest school grade completed, persons with whom the offender was residing, employment status of the household members, and the welfare status of the household. Included in Part 2 is information on age at first arrest, total number of prior delinquency arrests, and detailed information on up to ten prior delinquencies, such as arrest charge and severity, date of offense, disposition, and sentence. Part 2 also contains subsequent arrest and incarceration records of the offender. Included for each subsequent arrest is the status of the arrestee (juvenile or adult), the charge, categorized by type and severity, the date of the arrest, the conviction charge(s) by type and severity, the disposition of the arrest, sentence, and the date of the sentence. Included for each incarceration is the status of the offender (juvenile or adult), the date of admission to a facility, and the length of time incarcerated.

CODEBOOK NOTES

The juvenile case data are contained in a rectangular file. There are 1,890 cases. Each has 5 records per case for a total of 9,450 records.

Since both part 1 and part 2 contain the common identifier, ID, data from the two files can be merged.
